Particle technology may be described as being the study of materials dispersed within a continuous fluid. The particles may be solid, but they can also be oil droplets in water, water droplets in air, etc. So, by a particle we mean any dispersed material within a fluid. In many cases deformable particles have a slightly different behaviour to rigid ones, but the starting point for the ...

Powdered sugar's small particles have poor flow and compression characteristics. These small particles would have to be compressed very slowly for a long period of time to make a worthwhile tablet. Unless the powdered sugar is granulated, it could not efficiently be made into a tablet that has good tablet characteristics such as uniform content or consistent hardness. The granulation ...

The term applies only if the particles are larger than atomic dimensions but small enough to exhibit Brownian motion, with the critical size range (or particle diameter) typically ranging from nanometers (10^{-9} m) to micrometers (10^{-6} m).
