Strummer and Jones worked together more like Jagger/Richards, but their solo careers were more like Lennon and McCartney's (including the tragedy). Jagger and Richards actually seemed to have less creatively and commercially successful solo careers than Strummer and Jones did, I mean, proportionately, of course, compared to their respective careers in the Stones or the Clash. Keef is a fairly ...

My Clash playlist has over 220 songs by the Strummer/Jones version of the Clash, alone, including a few remixes, alternate/outtake versions, demos and rare live tracks, which would be like 3-4 albums worth of material for each year of their existence, so I can certainly forgive them for messing around with children singing "Career Opportunities" or whatever is going on in "Red Angel Dragnet."

Strummer & Jones: The Clash and afterwards | Steve Hoffman

In an October 2013 interview with BBC 6Music, Jones confirmed that Strummer did have intentions of a Clash reunion and in fact new music was being written for a possible album. In the months prior to Strummer's death, Jones and Strummer began working on new music for what he thought would be the next Mescaleros album.
